
"Art captures beauty; even with the use of a simple language, art can be formed. To let art flow naturally, you mustn't cage it into restrictive boundaries. Like how you would make a portrait of a bird, art is meant to endure, not be enforced. Art also reminds us that patience is a virtue, as without patience, good art cannot be made, nor a genuine work of art can be produced."
"Art opens up doors. Not only that, but it also captures the very essence of human skill, emphasizing the ability and talent of mankind. That said, it plays a vital role in architecture, showcasing the character of a structure. St. La Salle Hall makes a beautiful example; it houses dreams and realized education built on genuine kindness and faith, and throughout the years, it has never wavered and has been maintained daily. Even as time passes, its art endures and becomes contemporaneous with many, with plenty of stories beholden, both told and untold."

"Art has the ability to depict scenes well, down to the smallest details. With this, it can also carry messages, as well as emotions felt by the subjects themselves. The painting Supper at Emmaus shows an incredible application of how light and dark shadows come together for a spectacular display. These lightings make a great support for the atmosphere of the captured scene by hand, allowing the viewer to focus on the subject's expressions and how they come together to create a dynamic painting. This work of art also makes us ponder the themes of art and how it can be contextualized, allowing us to engage with stories on a deeper level."
